2. Independent device claim 1
Document D1 discloses a measuring device for detecting at least one fluorescent and/or light-absorbent indicator contained in a fuel (see column 5, lines 10-14; column 6, lines 12-15), comprising: a measuring section (12) which is formed by a light-permeable material and through which the fuel flows; at least one light source (16), which shines on the measuring section; a light-capturing device (20B), which is hit by the light (28B), which passes through the fuel flowing through the measuring section and/or emanates from the indicator as a result of a fluorescent effect, and which generates a corresponding measuring signal as a function of the strength of the incident light; and an evaluation unit (22) for evaluating the measuring signal.

The measuring device is arranged on a line leading away from a storage tank, D1 not specifying what lies at the other end of the line.

Claim 1 is directed to a machine, for example the engine of a motor vehicle, comprising a filler pipe for a service fluid, namely lubricating oil, engine oil or hydraulic fluid, into which a measuring device such as that described in D1 is integrated such that when filling the machine with the service fluid through the filler tube, said fluid at least partially fills or flows through the measuring section.

It is therefore possible to recognise if the machine is being filled with an unsuitable service fluid or to optimise the change intervals for the service fluid as a function of the service fluid with which the machine is filled.

D1 does not suggest integrating the device described therein into a machine.

Document D2 discloses a measuring device such as that described in D1, figure 1 clearly showing that the measuring device is arranged on a line that leads from a storage tank to a motor vehicle.

D2 refers exclusively to fuel substances and not to service fluids such as engine oil. Therefore at best, D2 could prompt a person skilled in the art to integrate the measuring device described therein into the tank of a motor vehicle such that when filling the vehicle with the fuel through the filler tube of the tank, the fuel passes through the measuring section.

D2 does not suggest integrating the measuring device described therein into a machine so as to measure a service fluid, for example into the engine of a motor vehicle.

The machine as per claim 1 is therefore considered novel and inventive (PCT Article 33(2) and (3)).

3. Independent method claim 9

Claim 9 is directed to the use of the device described in claim 1 and is therefore, mutatis mutandis, also novel and inventive.
